Dear readers,

welcome to my/our experience on the screening of "This Is America".

As we landed in the FLIKÜZI to watch Childish Gambino's groundbreaking music video, "This Is America," I found myself transported into a world where the harsh realities of racism were vividly portrayed. From the very first frame, I was captivated by the raw intensity and symbolism embedded within each scene.

The video's portrayal of violence, oppression, and racial stereotypes struck a chord deep within me. As a viewer, I couldn't help but feel a sense of discomfort and unease as I witnessed the brutal realities faced by Black Americans on a daily basis. The juxtaposition of joyous dancing and chaotic violence served as a powerful comment on the way society often chooses to ignore the systemic issues plaguing marginalized communities.

As we sat and reflected together on "This Is America," we all were reminded that the fight against racism is far from over. But with powerful works of art like this, we are given a bit of hope, a hope that through awareness, education, and collective action, we can strive towards a more just and equitable future for all.
